The Sixth Periodic Review of Westminster constituencies was launched on 4 March 2011 by the Boundary Commission for England, the Boundary Commission for Scotland, the Boundary Commission for Wales and the Boundary Commission for Northern Ireland. The Sixth Review would have resulted in 600 constituencies for the United Kingdom Parliament, a reduction from the 650 constituencies that existed for the General Election of 2010. The number of constituencies in each of the four home countries was calculated in proportion to the electorate using a formula set out in the legislation. For the Sixth Review, the formula specified 502 constituencies in England, 52 constituencies in Scotland, 30 constituencies in Wales and 16 constituencies in Northern Ireland.

In January 2013 Parliament amended the legislation governing the Sixth Review with the effect that the timetable for the Review was cancelled. A subsequent vote set a new timetable for the Sixth Review. This began in 2015 with an aim completion date of 2018 and popularly became known as the '2018 Review'.
